Ammonoids (AM-mon-oids) are the ancient relatives of the octopus. Like the octopus, they protected themselves from predators by squirming into an empty shell left behind by a previous generation. Many new kinds of ammonoids developed from earlier kinds. The last member of this group became extinct around 65 million years ago.

Each animal is given a descriptive name. Beneath it is the scientific name of that group.